

1. How can you be environmentally friendly at work?

In my daily work at Integra Soluciones Globales in the Hospital Santa Mónica de Dosquebradas, I try to be environmentally friendly by reducing the use of paper. For example, I prefer digital formats for reports and internal communications. I also make sure to turn off my computer and monitor when I leave for lunch or at the end of my shift. Additionally, I use a reusable water bottle and encourage my colleagues to separate recyclable waste, especially paper and plastic, which are common in hospital environments.

2. What kind of incentives could a green company offer to its employees?

I think (that) a green company like Integra Soluciones Globales could offer small but meaningful incentives, such as recognition for the most eco-friendly employee each month, or a “green point” system that can be exchanged for extra break time or a healthy snack. Also, the company could provide reusable kits (bottle, mug, bag) as a welcome gift for new employees. I consider (that) these actions motivate people without needing big budgets.

3. In what other ways could businesses involve their employees in environmental issues?

Businesses could create a voluntary “green committee” to lead weekly actions, like turning off unused lights or monitoring recycling stations. They could also organize talks or short workshops about how to reduce our carbon footprint at home and work. Another idea is to plant small indoor plants in work areas to improve air quality and connect employees with nature. In a hospital, we could even reduce the use of disposable cups by promoting ceramic mugs.

We must take care of our environment at work because every small action counts. We should start with simple habits like saving paper and turning off devices. Companies can offer incentives to motivate employees, but employees could also take the initiative without waiting for rewards. If we work together, we might create a cleaner and healthier workplace, even in a busy hospital like Santa Mónica in Dosquebradas.

I read the opinion from my classmate Ahmed Yamal, where he mentions using reusable containers and carpooling. I think (that) his ideas are very useful, especially in a big city. However, I consider (that) in a hospital environment like Santa Mónica in Dosquebradas, carpooling is not so easy because we have different shifts. Still, I really like his suggestion about turning off lights and computers — that is something we can all do immediately. Maybe we could also add a reminder sign near light switches to help everyone remember.
